Industry Analysis On August 22, 2010, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) published a final rule that allows employers with certain small enterprises to use respirable crystalline silica training to demonstrate that they have implemented certain best practices to protect employees from the health hazards of respirable crystalline silica. On September 24, 2010, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) published a final rule amending the regulations concerning portable electrical generation and handling devices and their associated equipment. This rulemaking makes various changes to the portable electrical generation and handling devices regulations. On June 14, 2010, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) published a final rule amending the construction industry safety regulations in Part 1926 to reduce the permissible exposure limit for crystalline silica from 10 to 2. The change was made to align the construction industry permissible exposure limit with the level in the general industry standard in 29 CFR 1910.95. On September 22, 2010, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) published a final rule amending the construction industry safety regulations in Part 1926 to eliminate the one hour permissible exposure limit for crystalline silica and to require employers to certify that they have a silica monitoring program. OSHA made the change to align the construction industry acceptable exposure limit with the general industry acceptable exposure limit in 29 CFR 1910.1025. On December 10, 2009, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) published a final rule amending the construction industry safety regulations in Part 1926 to revise the permissible exposure limits for crystalline silica and to eliminate the permissible exposure limit for respirable crystalline silica in a drill drilling operation performed at an elevation of less than 7,500 feet. On January 9, 2009, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OS

The metabolism of doxorubicin in human and rat lung. The metabolism of doxorubicin was investigated in human and rat lung. Using ¹⁴C-doxorubicin (500 microM) the following differences were observed between the two species: in man, approximately 60% of the drug was retained after a 60 min incubation; in rat, approximately 20%; in both cases a portion of the drug was excreted into the lung wash. While the uptake of drug was similar in both species in vitro, in the presence of 100 microM cycloheximide the rates of uptake of doxorubicin by human and rat lung slices were reduced by 50 and 95%, respectively. The intracellular retention of the drug was investigated in rat lung slices. It was found to decrease dramatically with time in the presence of the drug. In vitro, doxorubicin metabolism by both lung and liver slices from both species was similar. Approximately 80% of the drug was converted to doxorubicinol by rat lung slices while only approximately 20% was metabolized by the human lung slices. In vitro, the total amount of doxorubicinol present in incubations containing human or rat lung slices was similar. However, in lung slices from both species, incubation with 4 microM doxorubicin resulted in the formation of greater amounts of doxorubicinol than incubations containing 4 microM doxorubicin plus 100 microM cycloheximide. These data suggest that not only doxorubicin, but also doxorubicinol can be metabolized by rat lung slices.
