A pituitary mass or pituitary tumor is a collection of cells and tissue that is associated with the pituitary gland (see illustration above). Pituitary tumors are very common and are most often benign. These tumors may range from small to very large. Most often, people with pituitary tumors do not have symptoms. Tumors develop within the pituitary gland because of growth and changes within the pituitary gland itself. In most cases, pituitary tumors are not very large. The tumors may be smaller than 1 cm or about 4/5th of an inch in size. The top of the tumor is called the dome, and the bottom is called the floor. If the tumor is large, it may be more difficult to see the floor of the tumor, and this is called a "blind" pituitary mass. The most common symptom of a pituitary mass is pituitary headache or a headache. Frequently, the headaches are severe, most often in the evenings or at night. These headaches are usually worse on the left side of the head. You may also experience vomiting, neck pain, blurry vision, and weakness or pain in the arms or legs. In a number of cases, pituitary masses are discovered during a routine checkup. Sometimes, the person has not experienced any symptoms and the tumor was discovered only through a CT or MRI scan. In some cases, people have very large pituitary tumors. These are more rare. In
