In the Angular docs, they said that When promises are returned (from a function which returns a promise), the resolve and reject callbacks are functions which receive a single argument, the resolved or rejected value. But if I have a function like this: `function start() { console.log('hello'); return $q.when(true); } start().then(function(result) { console.log('hello again'); }, function(reason) { console.log(reason); });` Why doesn't the promise resolve in the first call to then? A: Don't "fool" q into resolving a promise. `function start() { console.log('hello'); return $q.when(true); } start().then(function(result) { console.log('hello again'); }, function(reason) { console.log(reason); });` start() is the trick. Because it returns a promise, it causes the promise to resolve. UPDATE However, there is no need for that overhead, for reasons I will explain below. Keep in mind, this is just one opinion. When I get in trouble in debugging, I usually do this: `function start() { console.log('hello'); return $q.when(true); } start().then(function(result) { console.log('hello again'); }, function(reason) { console.log(`
