Microsoft Account will be the replacement for Hotmail, Live, MSN, Outlook.com, SkyDrive, the Internet Explorer browser, Xbox Live, and more. And now Microsoft has announced the new system. How does it work? Use of the new identity system will expand beyond your Microsoft account. You can use it to sign in to third-party services, such as Dropbox and Amazon. Microsoft says it has added several common security questions that will result in your Microsoft Account being more secure than what you use on other sites. Microsoft Account will also be used to sign into Windows and other Microsoft services in the future. Microsoft says it has built in tools to help people control what Microsoft knows about them. But some controls are going to be more transparent and automated. You will be able to review and edit your profile. However, if you are concerned about what information Microsoft may know about you, you can turn off the basic profile setting. Microsoft says it will be taking new steps to make it easier to find your Microsoft Account in order to protect your personal data. The new identity system will also be used to log into Windows 10. Microsoft will be using a two-step verification process to log into Microsoft Account, with a second layer to ensure that the person who signed in is indeed you. Will this replace the email address that I've been using for 15 years? It depends. If you still use your Hotmail, Live, MSN, Outlook.com, SkyDrive, Internet Explorer browser, Xbox Live, and Windows Live accounts, you will continue to use those addresses. But you can also sign in to some of your third-party services that integrate with Microsoft Account, using your Microsoft Account address. And since many third-party services will now let you log in with your Microsoft 09e8f5149f
