Customized servers keep the playerbase of a game going and allow you to run and modify the rules and rulesets. With a server, this means that every player that logs in to the server will receive the same rules and rulesets that you have set up. As long as you make the server public (that is, you make it so that everyone on the internet can log into it and play on it), anyone can play on it. The ability to modify the settings of servers is available because there are different ways for a server to be created, each of which includes different settings that it has. There is no one way to build a server for a specific game, because games use different software packages to build their servers, and each of those packages has a different collection of settings. There is no one "default" server, because the settings for any given game are different. The tutorials aren't always up to date. For example, the tutorial on how to set up a server for Rust is incomplete, because Rust isn't actually a native server, but a native client, which is why it's missing from the tutorial. In the best cases, when there is an official servers' script, a tutorial can work as a way to learn how to modify the server's settings, without having to actually have a server up and running
