One of the most difficult challenges facing embryonic stem cell (ES) researchers is generating ES cells from adult tissues. Patient-specific human ES cells can provide an invaluable resource for understanding how human diseases develop. However, current sources of human ES cells are limited. Our studies suggest that adult-tissue-derived fibroblast and hematopoietic cells can spontaneously differentiate in vitro to cells with ES cell-like properties. We developed a small molecule-based screening system to identify chemical compounds that enable ES cell differentiation. The goal of this application is to identify the pathways and specific cell types that are responsible for the generation of ES cell-like cells. First, in Aim 1 we will identify the signaling pathways that are required for the spontaneous generation of ES-like cells from adult fibroblasts and hematopoietic progenitors by screening a small-molecule library. Using these results, in Aim 2 we will test the molecular basis of the identified target pathways by generating knock-in mice that contain mutations in these genes. In Aim 3, we will generate transgenic mice in which dominant negative factors are expressed in specific cell types to determine the contribution of these cells to the generation of ES cell-like cells
