Yang was invited to chime in on Apple's "urgent" request to the appeals court after winning this week in the Supreme Court. However, her arguments center around issues that she brought up before the Supreme Court. In an interview with the BBC after her victory, Yang said it's good to have the Supreme Court ruling, but added that "the law has taken a turn for the worse" since the U.S. was founded. "I think that the purpose of the Constitution is to limit the power of the government," she said. "This is a symptom of the judiciary extending its power. There are three branches of government — two of them are separated, the third is the judiciary. The judiciary has made a mistake." The justices' short dissent was a snide one. "The majority apparently has taken a dim view of judicial precedent," Justice Sonia Sotomayor wrote. "The rule is clear: An appellate court must follow the law as it is," Justice Kagan added. "Today's decision means that — assuming no radical reinterpretation of the Constitution — the 9th Circuit will get it right next time." Here's the latest on the Supreme Court's ruling: What's at stake Not much, beyond the competing interpretations of the Constitution. The Supreme Court's arguments were limited to whether the plaintiffs — a group of women and the non-profit organization Center for Reproductive Rights — were likely to succeed in their effort to overturn the 9th Circuit's decision. The group did not challenge Arizona's abortion law itself, but only the scope of the law's effects on women in a dozen Arizona counties. Now, the justices have almost no choice but to rule. What happens next The Supreme Court has taken the unusual step of hearing an emergency appeal — which means it intends to rule quickly. "To have an opinion on this before the election is very, very, very urgent," said Justice Clarence Thomas, speaking at the court on Tuesday. The justices have two choices: They can either deliver the emergency ruling in time

Photo For the second time in less than a week, Attorney General Jeff Sessions’s use of taxpayer funds to pay for an expensive flight upgrade to his government-issued airplane has prompted renewed scrutiny of his use of government resources. In early April, The Washington Post reported that federal records show Mr. Sessions paid for premium seats on an American Airlines flight from Washington to Mobile, Ala., a trip some said was unnecessary and an expenditure that was “ill-timed, ill-advised and potentially unlawful.” Now, The New York Times is reporting that Mr. Sessions’s private plane was not only upgraded at a cost of more than $11,000 to a first-class section on a United Airlines flight from Washington to St. Petersburg, Fla., Mr. Sessions’s lawyer and his staff were also upgraded, a move that was not authorized by the Justice Department. A Justice Department spokesman told The Times that the travels, on a government plane, were “legitimate” for reasons that include meetings with officials who are working to implement Mr. Sessions’s agenda on issues ranging from criminal justice to religious liberty. “Senator Sessions’s travel is essential to engaging with Americans about our policies and priorities,” the spokesman, Ian Prior, said. The meetings at issue were with Florida attorney general Pam Bondi, who is a Republican gubernatorial candidate against Gov. Rick Scott, a Republican; the Rev. William Barber II, an activist who opposes those who would find a legal loophole to allow the right of gay couples to marry in all 50 states; and Pam Patrick, an evangelical Christian who is the 3da54e8ca3
