The predominant negative correlation between domain scores and bead concentration offers evidence that the signal-intrinsic contribution is negatively correlated to domain score, whereas the unimodal, positive distribution of domain scores near the bottom of the concentration scale implicates signal-extrinsic contributions that are positively associated with domain scores. The beads and spheres of the phantom appeared in the same frequency range as blood cells in clinical MRI. Moreover, they have comparable radii and signal properties, so we can make a reasonable comparison of correlation between the two phantoms. The correlation coefficients between domain scores and  $^{55}\text{Fe}$ - $^{59}\text{Fe}$  were larger than those between domain scores and  $^{55}\text{Fe}$ - $^{57}\text{Fe}$ , and a bimodal distribution of domain scores was observed for the signal-extrinsic domain-specific score. These results have two important implications for the experimental design of future studies. First, because the signal-extrinsic characteristics did not significantly correlate with domain scores in the presence of the signal-intrinsic effects, it is advisable to focus more on the development of bulk tissue-specific contrast mechanisms. Second, because the magnitude of the domain-specific signal change is proportional to the average  $^{55}\text{Fe}$ - $^{59}\text{Fe}$ , it is important to evaluate the contribution of the signal-extrinsic effects, which e79caf774b
