Are there any other css attributes (other than :hover and :visited) similar to :link and :visited? I.e. something like :active. Just want to know if there are any? Thank you A: Yes, there is no class like :active. :active is a pseudo-class that has a value of link when the current element is active. Just like :visited, there is no value :inactive. You can also use the :focus, :link, :visited, or :hover pseudoclasses. Q: Rails build in controller I'm working on a Ruby on Rails 3.0 app and I'm trying to follow the rails conventions by building new methods into the controllers. But I'm a little stuck. Should I use a before_filter in the controller to do my action? Should I use self.foo = params[:bar] in the controller? So for example, is it "best" to use self.foo = params[:bar] in the controller, and what is the difference? Thanks! A: A controller should normally be very thin in terms of functionality. The controller is in charge of the flow of the request as the application walks the stack, and it should be able to pass on the results of its logic to whatever point it needs. It is also where you would pull out whatever "business logic" is common to your application, and put it in a place
