MacOS.Q: How to extract variable name from va_list Suppose I have a list of functions that take an argument (like my_function(int var1, char * var2)), and a variable called var that is passed to them. I would like to write a function that passes the list of functions and an array of variable. void do_stuff(func_array_t functions, char args) { //how to get the variable name here? } A: You cannot, at least not as of the C standard. The type function_t is actually va_list, so you can probably get information from that, but that's not very portable. You may be able to use gcc extensions which let you expose the innermost type of an expression, but that's not portable either. A: The basic type you will be dealing with is "va_list", but that is just the name of the type, not the name of the variable. Some implementations have an additional "va_alist" type which contains the above type plus a pointer to an array of va_fields_t structures. The results of the treatment of 102 patients with malignant melanoma of the female vulva at the Department of Skin and Soft Tissue diseases of the Clinical Centre of Belgrade during 1961--1970 are presented. The disease takes place most frequently before 30 years of age and the incidence is 2--3 times greater in women than in men. The majority of patients suffer primarily from the destruction of the lower third of the vulva, spread of the tumour into the inguinoperineal region and the infiltration of the perineum and inguinoperineal lymphnodes. The therapeutic results are unsatisfactory, on account of the difficulty of early diagnosis and the massive spread of the tumour. Because of the
