vo embolization of the left atrium and mitral valve apparatus after balloon valvuloplasty. The significant embolization of large air bubbles and bone fragments into the left atrium after balloon valvuloplasty may be a frequent cause of ological deficits. The relationship between the risk of embolization and the degree of mitral valve regurgitation after valvuloplasty was studied in 38 patients undergoing balloon valvuloplasty. A total of 60 left atrial transseptal atrial eters (7 French, Thermodox) were used in the first 42 patients for left atrial transseptal access (n = 18) or for the delivery of mitral valve prostheses (n = 24). Using the material provided by the manufacturers, we filled these catheters with ated balloons. Embolization events occurred in nine of 19 (47%) catheters in the 18 patients with persistent mitral valve regurgitation before valvuloplasty, but only in two (6.5%) out of 30 catheters in 22 control patients with no mitral valve rgurgitation before balloon valvuloplasty. All embolic events occurred after the creation of at least a 1-mm tear in the mitral valve leaflets. The degree of mitral regurgitation before and after valvuloplasty was similar (p greater than 0.05) in ents with or without embolization. The severity of mitral regurgitation was not predictive of embolization in this study. In 4 of 39 (10.3
