To provide an ecologically valid assessment of walking impairments of people with Parkinson's disease (PD), first we will provide a thorough description of existing walking assessment tools and outcomes measures. We will then conduct a search of existing quantitative research on gait and motor impairments in people with PD. To date, only five studies have described existing walking tools and outcomes, and no study has explicitly evaluated gait in PD. Existing outcomes, which are primarily self-reported measures, provide information on gait characteristics but are limited to a specific patient population and may not be generalizable to the wider PD population. We will conduct a systematic review of existing research and tools to identify the best-available outcomes for assessing gait impairments. For example, the Unified Parkinson's Disease Rating Scale motor section (UPDRS-III) and a clinician-reported walking impairment tool will be used to describe existing tools. The BBS, TUG, 10-Meter Walk Test, and NeuroGait have been used in a PD population; however, not all are specific to PD and are limited by small sample size. To evaluate outcomes, we will use a real-life feasibility design with a sample of 25 participants with PD who are medication free (18 females and 7 males; age range 44-88 years; years from diagnosis range 2-19 years). Participants with PD will complete the UPDRS-III, clinician-reported walking impairment tool

Typically, these sanders have a motor housing that contains an electric motor, a sanding belt and a tool housing containing a replaceable sandpaper pad. While battery powered sanders are widely used, there are many areas where battery power is not readily available and owners of battery powered sanders have to rely on the use of an external power supply such as an AC adaptor. A further concern with battery power sander is that a change in battery performance can cause the handheld sander to operate inefficiently, causing poor material removal, vibrational overexertion or overheating of the motor.
