Pain following acute surgical procedures is under-researched. We studied whether pain scores in patients presenting to the emergency department (ED) post-appendectomy and post-colorectal surgery were associated with post-operative length of stay. We identified from the hospital database all patients with appendicitis or colorectal surgery from July 2007 to July 2009. ED pain scores on arrival and at discharge were recorded for all these patients. The primary outcome measure was post-operative length of stay (LoS). Secondary outcomes were post-operative pain scores and decision to admit patients to a higher level of care. Demographic information, LoS and pain scores were recorded from patients' ED and hospital records. All procedures were performed in the same centre. There were 1112 adult patients with

We describe a patient with posterior cortical atrophy (PCA) characterized by a rapid and irreversible loss of many visual areas of the occipital cortex and severe cortical blindness. Vision, spatial attention, olfactory, and gustatory function were preserved; auditory and tactile sensations were preserved. The patient's brief glimpses of visual sensations suggest that processing of high-level visual features was preserved; however, the capacity to maintain knowledge of the past, present, and future was severely impaired. We suggest that PCA patients not only have a visual-spatial neglect syndrome, but that they also have an olfactory-gustatory neglect syndrome. You don't get this job by being a good person.
