A significant problem with conventional beam tubes is the difficulty of obtaining an accurate image on a display screen. For example, when a beam is generated by a cathode ray tube and is directed by means of deflection electrodes to the display screen of the tube, the electron beam may be deflected by undesired amounts in directions other than that in which it is aimed. This is due to, for example, an inaccurate alignment of the deflection electrodes or poor connections, or other misalignment of the electron beam. In an extreme case, the electron beam may actually strike the display screen. Such a phenomena is called "doming" of the beam tube and is a major cause of poor quality images on display screens. To prevent electron beam doming, it has been known to adjust the deflection of the beam by adjusting the amount of deflection. However, this has many disadvantages in that the adjustment cannot be accurately made without the necessity of testing the image and that the adjustment can only be made before the beam tube is installed. Other techniques for reducing electron beam doming employ the use of constant accelerating anode voltage and varying deflection. This technique is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,361,935 to Hans-Hermann Engel. However, the use of constant accelerating voltage requires that a considerable amount of current be drawn from the system, increasing the heat load.London's 'Last Great Train Station' could get a hotel for the first time in a century If you want a little dose of history with your beer and a self-congratulatory slug of nostalgia, then our recommendation for Saturday's pub crawl in Soho - the Last Great Train Station pub crawl - is the perfect fit. The pioneering pub crawl started in 1986 by Karl Sutton and now runs a series of events across the capital on the last Saturday of the month. Following in the footsteps of the Last Great Pub Crawl in Southampton, the original and much-loved Soho crawl will not only start and end at the iconic bus station pub, but the tour also visits restaurants, art galleries, record shops, and a host of other diverse
