High concentrations of perilipin 1 in the blood are an indicator of abdominal obesity and of the risk of type 2 diabetes and other diseases. Because perilipin 1 is predominantly stored in white adipocytes, the aim of this study was to determine the contribution of large adipocytes to circulating perilipin 1 concentrations. The study was performed in a series of 96 male and female volunteers. Intravenous injection of tetradecylthioacetic acid (TTA) caused a significantly smaller reduction in circulating perilipin 1 concentrations in the subcutaneous adipose tissue than in the abdominal visceral adipose tissue. Perilipin 1 concentrations in the blood increased to a greater extent after the TTA injection into the subcutaneous than into the visceral adipose tissue. Subcutaneous adipocytes were larger than visceral adipocytes and were positive for perilipin 1 and the phagocyte marker CD68 but negative for apoptotic markers in the absence of TTA. After TTA injection, large adipocytes were observed only in the subcutaneous fat, and perilipin 1 staining in the subcutaneous adipocytes was reduced, suggesting decreased perilipin 1 release. Our results indicate that large adipocytes contribute to circulating perilipin 1 concentrations, especially in the subcutaneous adipose tissue.Q: How can I find occurrences of an item in a row?
