More specifically, the present invention relates to a method of manufacturing a mask blank in which a chromium film formed on a substrate is etched, and to a method of manufacturing a mask such as a photomask and the like. Semiconductor integrated circuits have recently become highly integrated, and as a result, a linewidth of each line within an integrated circuit has become very fine. In addition, the integrated circuits have become more highly integrated, and along with this higher integration, a circuit line pattern has become finer and more precise. Along with such fine circuit patterns, the resist pattern for each pattern line of the circuit patterns has also become finer. In forming a resist pattern for a semiconductor integrated circuit, a developer is applied to a photomask on which the circuit patterns are formed. Then, the developer is exposed to light, and the exposed developer is removed by a development process. This is the so-called photoengraving process. In a process of transferring a fine circuit pattern to a semiconductor substrate by a photoengraving process using a photomask, the resist pattern is patterned on a portion of the photomask corresponding to the circuit pattern. The resist pattern is formed on a thin chromium film called a chromium mask, which has been formed on the photomask. In et
