That's the question psychologist Martin Seligman poses in his new book, "The Moral Landscape: How Science Can Determine Human Values." His answer: the vast majority of Americans would. Science appears to be marching inexorably toward the quest for the absolute best possible human life. In Seligman's view, our best hope is a set of emerging values based on what is "natural" or "human," which he calls "positive psychology." A new book is released each week, and finding one can be a challenge. By its very nature, the high demand for these books can sometimes make for an overcrowded bookstore shelf. But this week's new release is a clear cut first choice.

Follow the link below to order a copy of "The Moral Landscape" today. Lindsay Lohan's Supposed Intoxicated Arrest Video Just Gets More Surprising After Lindsay Lohan was arrested at a New York City club last Thursday, Lohan tried to cover her face with her jacket. It was a big surprise; clearly, the 26-year-old actress didn't expect anyone to catch her. Then on Saturday, TMZ posted a video on its website of the arrest. In the video, the paparazzi -- who were reportedly already outside the club -- do what they came to do and set up to film Lohan's arrest. They follow her as she attempts to leave the club. But the most surprising part is her reaction as she tries to push past the paparazzi. Initially, she tries to ignore the cameras, but then a man with an iPhone starts filming her. He then starts acting like he's trying to shield her from the cameras while trying to protect her from the police. Quality of Life Data For Your Mental Health April 19, 2013 Let's be honest, who
