A suspension of interest on student loans can provide a huge boost to a teenager's future, especially if they're taking gap years. Suspended interest on student loan repayments is a policy that cuts the amount of interest that student borrowers pay each month, during the period of their study. While repayments are much more affordable with this interest cut, it's important to look at the total cost of the loan. There are three different types of student loans: UNS: This is a loan provided through the Universities and Colleges Union and is available to students taking part in, studying for, or working at post-16 education or higher education institutions in England. Part-repayable: This is a loan provided by the government and available to students taking part in, studying for, or working at post-16 education or higher education institutions in England. Repayable: This is a loan provided by the government and available to students taking part in, studying for, or working at post-16 education or higher education institutions in England. Here's how suspended interest can help you pay off your student loan. Why is suspended interest on a student loan useful? Suspended interest means that there is no interest on the loan for the time when it's in the process of being paid off. In other words, while the loan is in payment mode, the monthly repayments are calculated at a much lower interest rate, as shown in the example below. The monthly repayment is the only loan-related expense, and the amount you pay is based on how much you have left to pay back. This means that every month spent in a job to pay off the loan means more money going into your bank account. It's a policy that could really add up over time. "When the monthly repayment is added in (during the loan period) it's in effect on a no interest basis - so it could potentially result in a massive saving." Paul Daffey, personal finance expert at MoneySavingExpert, told BBC News. "For many people, this could be very useful." If your student loan includes a "repayable" element, the Government has waived one year of interest for students, but this is only available on loans taken out before 1 August 2012. When should you apply for a loan? The best time to apply is when you've graduated from college or

The present invention relates to a tungsten halogen lamp, for example, a xenon-tungsten halogen lamp having a so-called Heras type discharge tube, and more particularly to a tungsten halogen lamp having a transparent discharge tube, wherein the reflected light from the inner surface of the discharge tube is suppressed by an anodized layer formed on the outer surface of the discharge tube, thereby improving the overall light distribution of the lamp. In general, a tungsten halogen lamp, for example, a xenon-tungsten halogen lamp, emits white light. Therefore, this lamp is widely used as a car lamp, for example, in automobiles and portable phones. This lamp is also used as a headlight in a car. This type of xenon-tungsten halogen lamp, for example, the lamp disclosed in Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 10-27800, has a so-called Heras type discharge tube. FIG. 6 is a cross-sectional view of this type of lamp. The lamp has a tube header 110, an anode 110a, a cathode 110b, and a discharge tube 120. A discharge gas consisting of a mixture of a gas generant, a rare gas, and xenon, and a rare gas diluted with a small amount of xenon is filled in the discharge tube 120. A translucent glass bulb 130 is provided to the outer circumference of the discharge tube 120. The translucent glass bulb 130 reflects the light radiated from the lamp and thus lowers the glare when the lamp is used as a car lamp. A transparent sealing glass 140 seals the end of the discharge tube 120. A reflector 150 having an elliptic section is attached to the outer side of the sealing glass 140. The reflector 150 is disposed so that part of the light radiated from the discharge tube 120 reaches the outside of the transparent glass bulb 130, thereby improving the light distribution of the lamp. In the structure described above, ultraviolet rays are generated by a discharge occurring in the discharge tube 120. The ultraviolet rays then cause a phosphor (not shown in the figure) to emit red light. The red light is radiated from the translucent glass bulb 130, thereby improving the light distribution of the lamp. In the xenon-tungsten halogen lamp described above, a phosphor screen is formed on the surface of the translucent glass bulb 130. The phosphor screen is formed by applying an
