Highly sensitive enzyme immunoassay of plasma transthyretin using monoclonal antibody. A highly sensitive solid-phase enzyme immunoassay for the determination of transthyretin (TTR) in human plasma is described. The TTR was purified using a combination of ammonium sulphate precipitation followed by affinity chromatography using two antibodies specific to TTR: a monoclonal antibody (MAb) and a rabbit polyclonal antibody. The concentration of the TTR in human plasma was estimated in the range of 0.05 to 9 ng/ml. The sensitivity of the assay is about 20-fold greater than in ELISA employing MAb as the antibody, allowing reliable measurements of very low plasma TTR concentrations. The use of human TTR as standard greatly increased the sensitivity as compared with using bovine TTR as a standard. Formation of localized states due to longitudinal electron waves in a two-dimensional metal. We demonstrate the formation of localized states in a thin metal film by an increasing in-plane magnetic field. The localized states are coupled in a nonlinear way to longitudinal electron waves in the film, which gives rise to coherent emission of electromagnetic waves. We present the results of numerical simulations of the current density and current-density current-density integral for the excitation conditions in which the formation of localized states takes place. We show that the longitudinal electron waves, when passing through the film, cause an additional modulation to the current density and current-density integral, which in turn leads to the formation of localized states. you work with, and one of the attributes that I try to emphasize is the importance of developing a realistic plan. The dangers of under-estimating the cost of acquisition, and the chances of the venture being a failure are very high. A realistic plan will give you something to shoot for. It will force you to get out of your comfort zone and be open to new ideas and ways of doing business. If you don't set a realistic plan, most of the other step you take will just be window dressing. The final step is to make sure you're confident. This is the thing that will make your plan succeed. Do you believe in your idea? If so, there's not much more to do. Do you think your idea has enough merit to be worth the effort? If so, there's no excuse to not start talking to people and getting things done.

AOL'S NEWSPAPER READERS ARE POLAR IN CONSEQUENCE Most Popular NEW YORK (AdAge.com) -- Increasingly, Internet users are abandoning print publications for print-free content delivered through their computers or mobile phones. At least one national print newspaper already has a model that can make a comeback by focusing on local audiences and catering to on-the-go viewers. Locally oriented newspaper, independent of traditional newspapers by the numbers More than eight years old, free newspaper circulates to more than 200,000 total readers Hundreds of independently owned stores, restaurants and retailers print "same-day" newspapers that are published overnight and distributed the next morning Traditional newspaper publishing is bucking the trend of free-content through tablet computers and e-readers; instead, it is embracing a new kind of product, one that makes it possible to post stories, video and images over the Internet, and bring news to readers immediately. It also makes it easier for traditional newspapers to adopt local-content strategies that preserve loyal and profitable audiences while retaining control over the content and message. The Wall Street Journal. The New York Times and other national newspapers have been delving into the more localized, on-the-go reading that was once the exclusive domain of specialty titles, and several independent daily newspapers have explored similar strategies. But it's somewhat of a different model in that it largely bypasses traditional advertising, depending on the network of publications that are committed to printing the product. These outlets -- mostly free publications that have been around for years or perhaps decades -- play by a different set of rules. "We're not about to disappear," said Joseph Baker, director of product marketing for the New York Times and a co-founder of "Page by Page," an independent print publication. "We are working hard to
