migration in a patient with healed bilateral intraorbital fractures. Craniosynostosis is the premature fusion of 1 or more cranial sutures resulting in the impairment of skull growth and/or a facial deformity. Early diagnosis is usually possible by clinical examination when the deformity is mild and the sutures have not yet fused, although the accuracy of clinical diagnosis of craniosynostosis has been reported to be more than 90%. However, there are several reports of sutures that have migrated within the bony orbit after several months or years after trauma. There have been less than 10 reports of simultaneous bilateral orbital migration of cranial sutures. We report here a patient who had migrated posttraumatic bilateral intraorbital cranial sutures. Huge oak tree is begging its way into our hearts. “Pull me down, I want to stay!” the venerable tree insists, as a crew from the California Department of Parks and Recreation carefully shoves it backwards. An unexpected customer interrupts work and asks: “I like your tree!” so the crew leaves the massive red oak standing, with only a slight tinge of sadness in its sapling glow, like a child shed of a favorite toy. An emergency team had to be called in to take down the ancient tree, its roots were so deep that the non-native tree was pulling down the native Redwood trees and their visitors. The tree was considered a safety hazard because the branches were potentially blocking fire hydrants and power lines. Since the tree was a protected state treasure and to prevent further damage the men in tweed hats from the California Department of Parks and Recreation were dispatched. Loading... Loading... Loading...
Loading... Loading... Loading... This sickening action was possible because the state of California passed a law allowing the state to own and sell trees, and to decide on their future in a way that includes more public benefit than protecting trees. The California Public
