Two new methods are described for the preparation of Salmonella antigens in relatively pure form. Salmonella antigens were separated into a protein fraction, a fraction containing lipopolysaccharide and protein, and an aqueous fraction. The antigen preparations were used to prepare immunotoxins. Two toxins produced by different hybrid strains of Salmonella enterica subsp. enterica serovar Typhi (S. Typhi) are now being used to deliver targeting proteins to cells of the reticuloendothelial system. The methods described will contribute to the clinical development of these and other toxins.The broad, long-term objective of the PRELIANT project is to reduce postpartum morbidity and mortality by increasing the number of pregnant women who attend prenatal care and receive adequate prenatal care during pregnancy. The specific aims are to develop and evaluate a) a media campaign and b) an interactive health education computer game to increase the proportion of pregnant women who attend prenatal care. The three components of PRELIANT, launched in January 1994, are: 1) a radio-TV public service announcement campaign targeted to women's health centers, 2) a multimedia health education game
