As expected, Techdirt's Tim Carmody is among the first to assess the merits of the case, noting the problems with the pretrial surveillance dragnet. Then, in a curious and even fascinating turn, the defendants' lawyers are beginning to work on briefs -- including a brief in support of their client -- directly, instead of the more expected approach of refuting the charge against their client. The shift says a lot about who should be guiding the position the government's taking in the battle, and, most important, about whether it wants to resolve this on the merits. Meanwhile, the press has been abuzz with the rather bizarre spectacle of Assistant Attorney General for National Security, Thomas E. Kelly, trying to defend a 2013 military operation that he apparently hadn't seen before "arresting" a suspect. It may be fun to
