This invention relates generally to the processing of semiconductor wafers and, more particularly, to the etching of wafers having submicron features. The process of semiconductor fabrication involves the fabrication of an integrated circuit on a semiconductor wafer. The wafer is chemically and physically processed in various steps to complete the circuit. A common processing step involves plasma etching of a layer of material on the wafer. For example, in plasma etching a layer of photoresist, the wafer may first be coated with photoresist. The pattern to be transferred to the wafer is created by a lithography mask and projected onto the coating. Plasma etching of the coating is accomplished by directing a plasma of gases at the coating and etching exposed regions of the wafer. The etching process has several desirable attributes. Some of the most significant attributes are high etch rate and low surface contamination. The high etch rates make the etching operation

What's new in TODO: Today:

should be `!equalValue` rather than `greaterThan` or `lessThan`

`private static void compareValues(List list) { }` The problem I'm having is that I just add the `toString(char format)` parts and they're only added to a `get(char format)` method. How can I get the comparison to work before I add `toString`? Thanks! A: You just need to override the `toString` method in the `Number` class to include the format String. Then you can call `format` on each number as needed before calling `compare`.

class Number { private int num; private boolean isDouble; private String format; private static boolean equals = new Boolean(true); public Number(int x, String s, boolean d) { num = x; isDouble = d; format = s; } public String toString() { if (!isDouble) { return String.valueOf(num); } return format + num; } ... } NOTE: There is a bug in the logic of the equals method that will only trigger when the last (in value) member has a logical value of false. If that's not important for you, use the next option. public boolean equals(Object obj) { if (this == obj) { return true; } if (obj == null || !(obj instanceof Number)) { return false; } Number n = (Number)obj; return equals; ... } Now the method works as expected. public class Main { public static void
