- colorful graphics, suitable for eye and mouse; - game with lot of beautiful illustrations; - a story that will take you to different worlds and episodes in anime world; - many funny and pleasant characters; - a lot of secrets; - secrets about the fate of the other world, about Himari's past life, about Taimumari - about all the pretty and dangerous girls from the Academy. Enjoy! A: I found it! There is a free version of the game that you can play here. I found it by doing a search on The Anime List for "Himari". It is the first link there. In the game, you're a first year at the Magical Academy and you must defeat the "Chimera's" in order to advance to the second year classes. In addition, some of the plot details are shared in the The Anime List's announcement thread. Q: Is it ok to have a parameter of type 'void' in a function? Possible Duplicate: Is it a good idea to have a parameter of "void" in a function signature? I was just wondering if there's a reason that I shouldn't have a void in the parameter of a function? I know I can do this and it'll work, but is it possible for the function to do something if the param is null, or is a no-op on my part when the param is null? function fn(){ if(!param){ //do something } } Thanks in advance, A: Because when returning a void type, the compiler will automatically set the return value to a void type. If this is what you really wanted, the following works: function fn(void param) { } if(!param) // would have been a syntax error in the initial code fn(param); // just a no-op with no errors This is not the same as declaring the function parameter type as void, rather, in this case, it is a "void" parameter. See the Void Type section on MSDN: The JavaScript compiler predefines a type named void, which represents the type of an operation that returns no value (you might think of this as an operation with no return value). There is nothing wrong with it

For example, some electronic devices may include optical interfaces that are suitable for communicating optical signals with other devices. Some of these electronic devices may be transceivers that transmit and/or receive optical signals via an optical interface. For example, these electronic devices may be transceivers that receive, transmit, and/or receive optical signals (e.g., via the optical interface) as part of a network protocol and/or as part of an external interface (e.g., a transceiver interface). Due to the miniaturization and high speed requirements of many electronic devices, these devices may include both active and passive electronic devices. For example, some electronic devices may include one or more processors, amplifiers, and/or modulators that require a power supply voltage that is less than what is available from a conventional power supply. As is also well known, an “electronic device” may also include non-electronic components (e.g., resistors, capacitors, inductors, antennas, etc.). The inclusion of these non-electronic components may introduce significant losses to the electronic devices (e.g., due to generation of heat and/or radiation). In many cases, the electronic components of an electronic
