The proliferation of cryptocurrency mining operations is contributing to the rapid rise in noise pollution in some cities, a new study has found. A team of researchers from the University of California in Los Angeles (UCLA) analyzed historic data from Los Angeles and New York journal Noise levels near bitcoin and other cryptocurrency mines. In both cities, data showed that noise levels peaked during the day and averaged more than 65 decibels in proximity to mines. The study authors note in the journal Noise and Health that the potential of cryptocurrency to become the most widely-used cryptocurrency isn't clear yet, but the average spend on data centers around the world has been rising. That means that mining activity could quickly become more prevalent than ever before. Under current levels of production, that could mean that the environmental impact of crypto mining would be even larger than the industry already has. The potential for bitcoin to become the world's most-used cryptocurrency has been growing steadily over the last two years. The researchers note in the study that the rise of the cryptocurrency "has come with concerns for its environmental impacts." According to a recent study from the Rocky Mountain Institute (RMI) detailed in the report, bitcoin can account for a significant portion of electricity use in its regions. The study said that bitcoin mining operations currently use up to about 7 percent of the entire annual electricity use in Iceland, which already has some of the world's most carbon-intensive energy sources. Noise from cryptocurrency mining is primarily produced by cooling. That's because cryptocurrency mining involves heating up specialized equipment to create un-redeemable cryptographic keys which are used to "mine" cryptocurrencies. That, in turn, leads to louder noise because the cooling equipment can act like a giant fan. Air c
