First-time Abuser of the Day: Documentary Filmmaker By The Editors June 6, 2014 [Editor's Note: The Guilty Pleasure received more than 100 nominations in its first year, but we had to narrow the list down to ten in this year's edition. You can vote once a day through July 15 for our contenders.] [See the other nominees here.] Has there ever been a more perfect time to be a documentarian? We are all sitting around with our smartphones, never leaving the couch, and the cost of time and gas has been cut to a minimum. You can take the camera in your lap and go on a road trip, and with a couple of ways to transfer files, you can easily edit everything you shoot even while your driving. Best of all, the technological advances in digital filmmaking have finally brought the DIY approach to the masses. Anyone can film a documentary with the simple tools in their garage, and the new smartphone apps are making editing easier than ever. It's hard to believe there was a time when documentaries were only reserved for established institutions like PBS and National Geographic. But every documentary filmmaker knows that jumping into filmmaking with little or no experience makes for a difficult road. Filmmakers such as Carey Jones document the adventure with their films, which have become an important source of inspiration for new filmmakers. The Guilty Pleasure recently caught up with the film's producer and director to ask about this journey.  How did the idea for a documentary about light in our lives begin? Carey Jones: The idea of creating a documentary about light began with an article by Steve Goodman, an anthropologist, in Dwell Magazine in 2002 about the cultural significance of light. He traced the concept back to ancient civilizations and then to modern times and made the argument that we as a culture now spend most of our waking lives in artificial lighting. When I went on my first backpacking trip in 2007, I had no idea that I'd become a full-fledged natural light devotee. Back in 2007, I had just purchased my first Canon G12 digital camera. I embarked on the whole backpacking thing with no idea how I would use the camera, and at the time, digital had just started to take off. One of the biggest surprises was that I was willing to pay more money than I would have for other photos and videos, because the light was so important
