LONDON (Reuters) - British firms cut the number of workers they employed by the most in more than a year in November, official data showed on Friday, adding to fears that firms are faltering in their growth plans. FILE PHOTO: A sign is seen in a shop window in Oxford Street in central London, Britain, October 26, 2018. REUTERS/Simon Dawson/File Photo The ONS said employment fell by 42,000 in November, with another 1,000 public sector jobs lost, the most since July 2017. While December saw an increase of 4,000, the number is still extremely low compared to November 2017, when there were a total of 76,000 job losses in the financial, manufacturing, construction, oil and gas, and transport sectors. The ONS said employment fell by 80,000 in the 12 months to November 2018, the biggest loss since the financial crisis, with the loss of 40,000 jobs in the construction sector alone. Economists polled by Reuters had forecast a loss of 19,000 jobs, with some predicting a further rise in December. In October, employment began to fall but softened in November, suggesting the job market might be stabilising. When broken down into private and public sector, the picture was more mixed, with private sector employment holding up. Heather Somerville, chief economist at data provider Hiring Decisions, said the drop in October had been largely reversed in November, with no new weakness in employment appearing. “ d41b202975
