As the coronavirus outbreak spreads across the globe, manufacturers are increasingly focusing on their greatest resource, the human body. With more people living longer and older populations seeming immune to the Wuhan coronavirus, it's more important than ever to come up with ways to ensure the global supply of medical equipment. In just a matter of months, China has decimated the global semiconductor manufacturing industry, and things are only getting worse. Manufacturers have had to dramatically shift gears to keep up with the increased demand for ICs and electronics in the wake of the coronavirus outbreak, but a more immediate concern is the supply of medical supplies and equipment. A few weeks ago, the coronavirus outbreak in China was still manageable. But when the World Health Organization declared the outbreak a pandemic on January 30, things quickly changed. And if the latest projections are to be believed, China's economy will contract at an unprecedented rate of between 6.2 and 10.9 percent. And that's a very sobering thought. A quiet, impeccable China supplied the world with the vast majority of its consumer electronics and pharmaceuticals. But the escalating coronavirus outbreak has prompted a widespread public health crisis that could have an equally devastating effect on China's electronics manufacturing sector. According to the latest numbers released by the WHO, China has seen more than 36,000 cases of COVID-19 as of early February. That number is expected to

Wrap-up: This will be the first map I review for a significant period of time. As it is my first map, I expect to play it a lot, so I hope you all don't mind. In the coming months, I plan to give some more attention to my maps and make some maps of my own. However, I am not going to be as active with them as I was during this first stage. The main reason for this is that I have only one main computer and I don't want to give that computer away
