What's New in this Version Version 1.0.2.1: Simplified interface Notes: The issues related to resolution, installation issues and incompatible hardware are sorted out.Google Google has made Google Now quite the popular internet utility. If you have a smartphone, chances are you've downloaded an app which uses Google Now to turn your phone into a personal assistant. Google's new service -- available as a free app or subscription-based service -- essentially gives you your phone's data at your fingertips. You can turn your smartphone into a personal assistant which answers questions, sends reminders, and tells you what you need to know, like when you need to leave for an appointment. What more could you ask for? The trick with Google Now, is that it can tell you just about anything -- if you ask it. The New York Times compared Google Now to a master chess computer that keeps playing mind games with you. The Verge called it an "amazing search interface." And Engadget calls it "a personal Google that acts as a real-time guide to your life and a preprogrammed pop-up notifications." For the software to do this, it's going to need a lot of data. According to these reviews, Google Now is able to pull data from your Gmail, Google Reader, Google Calendar, Google Contacts, and, of course, Google Plus, though it's not clear how much you'll have to pay to get all that data. At least you can get a glimpse of what Google Now will look like in the app. (If you've already installed the free version of Google Now, a button on your home screen will let you access the latest information pulled into the service.) Or, you could see it in action in the video above, as Google Now pulled up information related to nearby restaurants, a movie playing nearby theaters, traffic conditions, travel info, and more. If you want to try Google Now, you can download it for free from Google Play. Google Now MORE FROM CLUELESS CES 2013:Q: Post
