A: When a question is closed, any answer will be just a starting point for other people to learn from. Since this question does not work as a starting point, I'm closing it. An outbreak of legionnaires' disease. We present the results of a multi-institutional outbreak of Legionnaires' disease (LD) in metropolitan Atlanta. Over an 11-day period, 52 patients from three hospitals in the greater Atlanta metropolitan area were hospitalized with LD. Most cases (97%) were diagnosed by urine antigen tests. Only one patient (2%) with LD had a positive culture for Legionella pneumophila. Case-fatality rate was greater for hospital patients than for outpatients (24% versus 5%, respectively; p What's new in this version 9.1.1 - Fixed installation path. It is now fixed. A total of 38 isolates of enteropathogenic Escherichia coli (EPEC) were obtained from children hospitalized with diarrhea in a Pediatric Hospital in Madrid, Spain, between January 1999 and December 2001. Using serotyping, 20 different O serogroups were identified. All belonged to serogroup O27, and were assigned to the different typing groups F3 (n = 27), E2 (n = 4), and G3 (n = 5). More than 85% of isolates possessed the structural and regulatory genes of the locus encoding the phospho-N-acetylmuramoyl-L-alanine amidase (P muropeptidase) of the LEE pathogenicity island. The remaining isolates harbored the genetic determinants that encode protein A (prtA), the enterobacterial common antigen, and the locus that encodes the translocated intimin (tir). The intimin and translocated intimin receptor genes were amplified by polymerase chain reaction, and the products were sequenced. The intimin gene detected had been described previously and was designated intimin eae. The novel truncated intimin tvi was classified as intimin V. The intimin V and intimin eae genes were closely related, sharing 85% similarity at the nucleotide level. The tir gene was not present in these isolates, suggesting that these EPEC strains may not encode a functional intimin receptor. In some cases, more than one gene was detected, indicating that these isolates were probably recovered from a heter
