Tip For the full description of the Photoshop editing system, see the box on the next page. Adobe Lightroom. Click here for more information. Figure 2-1. Many image editors display the image in one layer, with all layers nested underneath. It takes more work to isolate portions of an image for manipulation, but it can make for a more sophisticated image. In this photo, I've added a few different color effects. From left to right, they are Blurred, which adds an artistic blur to the image, a vignette with the Depth effect, and a posterization effect. # The Photoshop Editing System Photoshop is designed to perform edits on an image as a series of layers overlaid on top of one another. By getting layers at different levels of the image close to one another, you can create many more sophisticated effects. ## The Layers Panel The main ways that you can affect an image are through the tools of the Layers panel (Figure 2-2; the gray swatch shows the active layer, and its thumbnail is in the upper-left corner of the panel. You can add or subtract layers in the panel. You can do so by right-clicking the thumbnail and selecting Add Layer from the shortcut menu. Once you have several layers in the panel, you can duplicate them. This creates one layer with all the visible effects from the other layers. For example, if you're editing a picture of the Eiffel Tower, you might start with an image that contains only the tower. Then you might add a couple of image adjustments layers with filters to modify the color, contrast, or saturation, and a few layer styles (as described on Layers and Layer Styles"). To create additional copies, right-click the duplicated layer and choose Create Cloned Layer. This makes a copy of the original layer that's exactly like the original, except that it has a new layer name. The icons in the layers panel help you find specific layers. For example, the Quick Selection icon (see the box on The Quick Selection Tool) includes the brush, making it easy to paint the border around layers in the panel. Layer styles, discussed in Layers and Layer Styles" on The Layers Panel, also appear on the panel for easy access. To remove a layer, right-click it and

The Engadget offices are located in an interesting neighborhood, not far from where my friends used to live in Kolkata. I pass by their old street all the time but have only recently had a chance to visit it. Some of the buildings were recently rebuilt to house a series of small shops or restaurants, and at the time I was there it looked like it was going to be filled with Indian IT companies. I stopped in one shop and was greeted with smiles and questions in Bengali that I understood and couldn't answer. After laughing at their mistakes, we got down to brass tacks. I asked about a particular type of gadget for which I was interested. The native was surprised that someone in the US would know this thing, and his eyes lit up as he told me about all of the new gadgets that he'd just got in. I asked him for an iTouch, and was escorted through a maze of glass cases, where rows of strange, foreign, electronic devices were stacked floor to ceiling. It was clear that the Engadget office paid a hefty price for this neighborhood of shops. If that wasn't good enough, another friendly gentleman showed me a third-party charger, which they got for half price. I smiled as he pulled the plug out of a cheap, plastic housing and plugged it into the wall socket, amazed that he was willing to part with the goods for such a low price. I have been in India before, and while we got the price deals, it wasn't quite at the level of gadgets for sale in the US. When you compare the deals in Bombay with places like Calcutta, you will see just how fast prices are falling. I know that it can't be sustainable to get electronics for anything but a fraction of the price in the US. Eventually, it will have to go up, but we still have a long time to enjoy the savings. It also made me appreciate what I have, which is not much. I have gotten used to getting pretty inexpensive accessories that are quite literally a steal. There are plenty of things that I miss having from my time in the US, and that is what makes the trade-off worthwhile. The savings are tough to spot right now, but it's not going to take more than a few months before they start hitting. Then we will see if the whole of India still wants to buy Apple products, or if they will look for cheaper alternatives.

What's New In?

Q: Share a data file between different applications I am fairly new to MATLAB. I am using MATLAB with Windows 10. Currently, I am writing an application that extracts information from very large data files. The information of interest is stored in a struct (dictionary). My problem is that I need to create a code to take all this information into account and put it in a single data file. I.e. I would like to be able to merge all the dictionaries to a single structure and save it on a data file. I am looking for the best way to do this. Should I use a textfile or a csv file? Which of the two ways is the best? Which of the two ways is easier to implement? A: On Windows, to generate a csv file you can use the system function. This is a way to save a dataset as csv format: fileID = fopen('YourFilePath.csv', 'w'); for i=1:numel(struct.array); fprintf(fileID, '%s ', [struct.array(i).name; '']); end fclose(fileID); You can use your struct array to create the file name: % define struct array with your keys struct.array = struct('name', {'keyName1' 'keyName2' 'keyName3'}) Then you can use this same solution and loop over the numbers or element index of your dictionary that has a corresponding name.
