The clathrin-coated vesicle coat protein remains embedded in the membranes until the vesicle fuses with the membrane in which cargo is released and the vesicle de-cloaks. Clathrin-coated vesicles can be brought into a state of stable half-closed morphology by treatment with detergents, by incubating with ATP and depleting the ATP of the medium, or by treating with trypsin. Here, we show that these three different treatments have common features in their effects on vesicle morphology, on the recruitment of the coat into vesicles, and on the stability of the coat. These are: (a) clathrin vesicles release their cargo, (b) clathrin vesicles fuse by a mechanism dependent upon changes in vesicle morphology (or changes in membrane curvature), and (c) the stability of the clathrin-coated structure depends on molecular rearrangements of coated polymers in the membranes. The above observations suggest a model for the assembly and fission of clathrin-co b7e8fdf5c8
