We aimed to examine the influence of HIV-1 subtype on the antiretroviral response to highly active antiretroviral therapy (HAART) in a cohort of individuals infected with the predominant subtype in Romania, HIV-1 subtype C. Two hundred and fifty-five HAART-naive individuals were divided into groups according to HIV-1 subtype, genotypic sensitivity score and host HLA-B57 status. Baseline and 1-year follow-up CD4+ T-cell counts were analysed. HIV-1 subtype had no significant effect on the baseline CD4+ T-cell count (P = 0.66) or on the 1-year improvement in CD4+ T-cell count (P = 0.21). There was no difference in the CD4+ T-cell count between HLA-B57-positive and HLA-B57-negative individuals (P = 0.31). One-year HAART response was similar in subjects with HLA-B57-negative and -positive genotypes (P = 0.18). In contrast, HLA-B57-negative individuals with TNF-a Delta 32 mutation had a significantly higher one-year CD4+ T-cell count increase as compared to HLA-B57-positive individuals (P = 0.04).
