A variety of medical procedures are used to deliver a therapeutic agent to a target area within a patient. For example, thermal therapy has been used to deliver an agent to treat localized benign and malignant tumors. In particular, hyperthermia therapy is used to deliver the agent to the target tissue in order to kill the cells that are causing the tumor.

These agents have been delivered by the use of electrodes or by heating a fluid, such as a saline-based solution. One limitation of thermal therapies is that the cells surrounding the target are often damaged when the therapy is administered. Context: we applied for a patent and were surprised to be questioned by the USPTO. In those “dueling” patent formats, one person has to ask the most questions and we had not seen that kind of format in any of the patent applications that we had seen up to that point. So, we responded with our trademark filing and also discussed that with the Examiner. The Examiner was very enthusiastic about the trademark filing and we decided to file a brief and have it marked confidential by the Examiner. Result: we prevailed. No examiner's decision was required and the Respondent could not raise any of the issues that they had raised in the remarks. Blog There are several forms of application that can be used when planning a project or designing a technical solution. This is especially true when the project may involve several developing disciplines. For example, a sustainable project where all aspects of the project are designed to create a product that is efficient to use, aesthetically pleasing, and the right balance between technical viability and economic viability.
