What's new in Pleasure Puzzle:Sexy Girls DLC:

When the Valdrion released his voice through the splintered walls of Icewind Dale's Westgate Inn, no orc had heard him until two parts of the way around to the foot of it, and then only because the din of the angry mob grew so loud that only the unearthly wails and screams of the falsely accused had any echo that reminded them of his words. The Judge's bench had been reduced to little more than a pile of twisted wood and charred ash. Ralof's cousin had faded to a pallid shade, undaunted by his uncle's rage. The shot sturdy orc whose bright axe stroke had sent Hlal's first-born to the morgue had melted, congealed, and exploded into a violent smear of black, greasy sparkles, but how many had died with that orc? Yesterday, sundered beasts in the aisles had lashed out at anyone who crossed their path: trainers and their charges, priests and their god-hating soothsayers. Buccogrin and all the remaining orcs of Icewind Dale had stood together to face the mob, but they had no voice to resist the torrent of hurled rocks and burning brands. Even the dwarven clerk's scribbles and the clerics' babbling were of no avail as he scribed the letter between them unread. The plague was spreading among both humans and orcs across this once-strong and confident land that his parents' blood had bathed, while the mighty folk of the Dunnerd clans had melted away into the neighboring wildland like sea creatures of mutable form. When the implacable shadow crept up the flight of steps of the inn door, Buccogrin thought it was his doom. He held in his right hand the blade of an elven trident twirled and welded between fine dragon claws. He had mined it from the hilt of his great axe. The more of the blade's tines he had driven down, the more grace and power had come from those claws. But when he saw the tall man standing at the summit of the steps, Buccogrin knew his doom was no less sure. In the name of the algors, the mate who had eluded him for eons, the only god he had ever known or feared, Buccogrin thundered, "All honor to the algors!" "W
