programmer employs a shift register to achieve a DRAM controller that works with the on-chip DRAM. This, of course, requires each register to have sufficient storage capacity to accomodate an entire row. In the case of the previous 2 bits cells, a matrix array of 8 rows of 8 cells can be indexed by an address pin. The array contains an equal number of 1s and 0s. When a pulse is applied to a word line in the DRAM, every 8th cell is accessed. If the designated cell in the array contains a 1, the comparator generates a pulse that is sensed by the next shift register stage in the input stream. The next stage compares the current input bit with the prior input bit. If the bits are the same, the output bit will also be the same. If the bits are different, the output bit will be the same as the prior output bit. Thus, the net result is that each stage after the first stage has twice as many outputs as there are inputs. This results in a huge
