Between 1986 and 1990, 203 patients with nonseminomatous germ cell tumors (NSGCT) were managed at the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center with primary testis sparing surgery followed by postoperative cisplatin-based combination chemotherapy. Patients diagnosed with disseminated disease in addition to primary disease were excluded from this trial. Patients were treated with combination chemotherapy consisting of cisplatin (100 mg/m2 every 21 days), bleomycin (10 U/m2 on day 8), etoposide (200 mg/m2 on days 1-5), and vincristine (2 mg/m2 on days 1 and 8) followed by irradiation. To enable these and other types of optical fibers to function, the optical fibers often need to be inspected or tested. For instance, optical fibers for use in medical instruments, such as endoscopes, may be subject to testing to determine any defects, such as damage, in the fiber. Testing may include inspecting the fiber as it is pulled through the endoscope to ensure that it is intact. Testing or inspection of optical fibers may occur in two ways. First, the testing may be performed manually. In particular, the testing may involve manually passing a fiber through the end of an inspection device to determine if the optical fiber is intact. This is a very labor-intensive process. Second, the testing may be performed automatically. One way of automatically testing an optical fiber is by measuring the light loss in the optical fiber using a light
