The process of producing an integrated circuit (IC) commonly uses a thin film or single-crystalline silicon semiconductor which is deposited onto a substrate of the IC. A conducting line of the IC, such as a metal line of a wiring line or gate line of a transistor, is commonly connected to a substrate via a via hole that passes through the thin film. Conventionally, in order to fill a via hole, a via hole is overfilled with a conductive material that is deposited in a conformal manner that covers the entire via hole. Unfortunately, this deposition of the conductive material may result in the aforementioned voids and seams in the conductive material. The voids may be filled with another dielectric material, such as a thin film or low k dielectric (LKD) of an inter-metal dielectric (IMD) layer. These voids and seams degrade the performance of the IC. This is particularly a problem when the via hole has a very high aspect ratio (AR), e.g., via holes greater than 2.0. One conventional way of addressing this problem is to use a multi-step deposition process that deposits an initial conformal layer of a conductive material that covers an entire opening of the via hole. An etching process is then used to remove the initial conformal layer from the perimeter of the via hole (i.e., to the edge of the conductive material in the via hole), while the central part of the via hole remains covered with the conductive material. However, as the aspect ratio of the via hole increases, the etching process becomes increasingly difficult to perform. This is a particular problem when using a low pressure chemical vapor deposition (LPCVD) process to deposit a conformal layer on the substrate, since the LPCVD process requires relatively high temperatures, e.g., greater than about 400° C., to deposit the conformal layer. For example, as the aspect ratio of the via hole increases, the size of the via hole decreases, 0cc13bf012
