DBX, (Design Bezier Exchange), a file format standard for construction drawing files. In late 2003, the IFC (Integrated Facility Construction) specification was included in AutoCAD 2003. The IFC specification enables developers to include facilities within models. In 2012, Version 2013, the Autodesk Revit integrated building information modeling software from Autodesk was introduced. In 2015, Autodesk AutoCAD Subscription started with the release of AutoCAD 2015, replacing the Autodesk Design Review Application. The design review workflow is the same, but the application no longer offers the "autocad" design review. For example, instead of having an "autocad" design review, the "Autodesk Design Review" toolkit is now included in the design review workflow. In 2016, Autodesk was acquired by the Japanese group Morpheus Media. Extensions and Add-Ons The term "extension" is usually used to refer to add-on applications that are either available from the Autodesk Exchange Apps store or are developed by third-party developers. The products are generally designed for specific workflows. Some products, however, are designed for every user of Autodesk software. Extensions and add-ons are available in almost every major version of AutoCAD, although some may only be available for certain tools, e.g. the last time the "manage perspective" extension was available was before AutoCAD 2010. Some of the most popular add-on products are Viewer, Scanner, Pro Engineer, PC-Based CAD, Model Architect and Navigator. Autodesk has released over 30 Viewer products, including the Viewer for AutoCAD 2000 (which later became ACAD 2000). Other add-on products were discontinued over time, e.g. Scanner, Viewer Xpress, Pro Engineer and Navigator. Product add-on products may include new user interface features such as animations and sound, which are not provided by the built-in AutoCAD tools. Some of the Autodesk Exchange Apps products have their own Exchange app store. Autodesk also has its own Add-Ons (also known as Acapela) store which provides customizations (for example, Building Information Modeling), tools and productivity applications for AutoCAD.
