Pros: Diagnosis of severe Alzheimer sÂ .Flowering Flowering plants have the ability to produce floral organs (including stamens and pistils) to attract pollinators. The number of these organs has been shown to increase in stressful environments. Flowering plants range from herbaceous perennial plants to tropical epiphytic plants. Well-known flowering plants include Magnolia grandiflora (Magnolia), Euphorbia splendens, Podocarpus, and Quercus. Other plants that flower, but are not assigned as flowering plants, include the leaves of some palms (Arenga), and the leaves, seeds and flowers of some legumes (Fabaceae). About 80% of flowering plants are perennials which annually produce shoots and leaves that eventually develop flowers. Approximately 20% of flowering plants are biennials, which produce shoots and leaves that flower only once before dying. Flowering plants are usually identified by their inflorescence – a dense cluster of flowers on an axis or peduncle. The number of flowers and flowers per flower is usually greater in biennials than in perennials. The name flowering plant originally referred to the large subfamily Magnoliideae of the family Magnoliaceae (Magnoliaceae is related to the rose family, Rosaceae). In the past, flowering plants were divided into dicotyledons (2-seeded flowering plants) and monocotyledons (single-seeded flowering plants). As molecular phylogenetic methods have shown that flowering plants represent a single monophyletic group of plants the name flowering plant has been recently adopted to include all plants (single-seeded or not). There are more than 220,000 species of flowering plants (two-thirds of the species of flowering plants are angiosperms). Among flowering plants, angiosperms represent the largest group and are the most diverse in terms of their morphological, physiological and chemical characteristics. The first flowering plants were angiosperms – most of today's flowering plants, together
