Paypal Hacker 2019 is now available to download with full fledged. are: Paypal Money Adder V7 0 Activation Code Free Billowysajidali1.Q: Is there a way to lock various versions of a page to a specific domain? We have a page that exists on multiple web sites, and the page is intended to be unique to each domain. We can't make it accept parameters for the domain. Example: We can't have the page accept parameters like this: or or If you can think of any other pitfalls, please let me know. Is there a way to lock down the page to be unique for a given domain? Thanks, Ron Edit: We've created a token called company that is in the query string. We've checked this. It's used for filtering of data. In order to keep the page available for all of our websites, we have to store the data in a configuration file. The company token is used to check to see if the data is being pulled from a configuration file. I've added the token to the query string as mentioned above. We can't use a session variable or query string variable as the data that we're storing in the configuration file would get set from another application. We're not sure if session variables or query string variables would prevent a user from changing the company. A: The token in your query string, company, is an identifier of a company. When used in this context, I would be inclined to store this in the session variable. if (Session["Company"] == null) // retrieve company from configuration file You can make this a multi-user situation by storing the company in a non-per-user context, like a DB table or application-level variable. If the application is running in a user environment that is guaranteed to have a
