Occupy Wall Street and Occupy Together are announcing the release of a new campaign to mobilize against gun violence in schools. “The struggle in schools is the classroom-to-classroom fight for safety, well-being, and life. It is not one against a political ideology or one against the police. It is one against the erosion of bodily autonomy, economic disenfranchisement, racial inequality, and racist over-policing of Black and Brown lives,” said Hannah Patulny, a high school teacher who is the President of Occupy Wall Street's Caucus for Students & Educators. “Occupy Wall Street and Occupy Together will call for the immediate end to police presence, identification, and surveillance in schools. We will be leading a general assembly of teachers, school board members, and parents in schools across New York City to: organize for safer schools, abolish school-to-prison pipeline and de-incarcerate our schools, and realize a safe school environment for all students.” The call-to-action is supported by the National Lawyers Guild. This comes on the heels of the Sandy Hook Tragedy, in which 23 students and 6 adult staff were murdered at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newtown,

Connecticut. Since then, protests, vigils, and marches have spread across the nation, and the occupation of Wall Street has continued to grow in support and size, including many school occupations in the process. "In times of great crisis, New Yorkers can be very resilient. Imagine a world without Wall Street. Imagine a world without the incarceration of Black and Brown bodies. Imagine a world without all of this racism. An idea whose time has come!" said former Wall Street Occupier, Lillian Connor. "Teachers, teachers all across the country, organize a moment of silence to remember all the lives lost to the school-to-prison pipeline c6a93da74d
