Reviews Editorial reviews Publisher Synopsis This book deals with the opposition between Deleuze and Guattari and Althusser. The author argues that with regard to philosophy, both Deleuze and Guattari or, more precisely, the Deleuzian tradition are crucial for a possible understanding of post-structuralist philosophy, especially with regard to post-structuralism's "history of literature". As an illustration of this Deleuzian critique, Dreyfus analyses the use of a social constructivist hypothesis within Heidegger's conception of history, and compares this hypothesis with Deleuze's affirmative critique of the thesis. For example, in History of Madness, Deleuze and Guattari consider the question of whether history is possible and whether it really exists. The authors argue that the answer to this question must be negative and that history is a social construct that excludes and represses everything that contradicts the dominant modes of production. For Dreyfus, this analysis highlights the importance of Deleuzian philosophy as a field of philosophy that allows us to understand post-structuralism's theoretical problems and history of literature. Dreyfus' book is an analysis of two of the main ideas in Deleuze and Guattari's Concept of... Read more...1.
