Keygen.Heterogeneous distribution of sex-related dimorphic gene transcripts in the brain of Androgen-deficient obese rhesus monkeys. Sex differences in the brain are important for normal behavioral and cognitive functions in various mammalian species. At birth, however, there are few sex differences in the brain, and this difference in the brain is eliminated by prenatal androgen exposure. While the molecular pathways and mechanisms leading to the differences between male and female are not fully understood, previous studies have shown that the cortical regions (frontal and parietal cortices) of the brain are responsive to, androgen. Since these regions are highly involved in executive functions, cognition, and behaviors, and are less responsive to estrogen, this difference may result in an androgenic bias in male and female brains that affects sex-dimorphic behaviors. In the current study, we aimed to determine the identity and relative abundance of androgen-responsive genes in the prefrontal cortex (PFC) of androgen-deficient hyperphagic obese rhesus monkeys using a genome-wide expression profiling approach. In this study, we report for the first time, that more than twofold greater number of c6a93da74d
